That has an incredibly low flat note, which makes me wonder what key it might be in, and what instrument you'd play it on. Piano is most likely only because piano music sheets were one of the most common forms of music sheets produced, but that doesn't get me any closer and it frustrates me.

It has two linked staves, which does suggest piano style treble and base clef staves. I mean it could be a two instrument arrangement of something with whatever clefs are appropriate, but piano seems like the simpler explanation.

But no real clue about the key. Presumably not a key that has G flat, unless it is a courtesy accidental that is not marked as such.

I was investigating this last night some, and I went down a church hymnal rabbit hole as they would be made en masse and likely see a lot of excess, meaning they could easily be used as binding at a lower cost, and would also likely see more change outs of copies. Problem is that most church sheet music has words on it, and is much thinner.

eagerly awaiting that one person that's so into music they look at this and the date and are like 'oh this is _____'s 5th sonata in D'

Most likely reused paper the publisher had laying around. Odd to think that these haven't been seen for over one hundred years and weren't intended to be seen again. Might not just be the binding, the whole cover too unless there's some extra paper to the binding I can't see.

You know that now it's your job to get all the pieces out and investigate what song/score it was supposed to be, right? I imagine there's a music expert who can see parts of the score and figure out what the rest is; but that's probably assuming it's a somewhat famous score as opposed to an unknown piece nobody heard.

I thought about it, but the book is fairly valuable ($160), and I didn't want to add to it's destruction.

A lot of my older books have pages from other books or newspapers (printed on rag paper) under the spine.
